

Conflict in data?

General population surveys have shown that relatively high numbers of men experience domestic violence. But police and hospital stats show women are most often the victims and men are most often the perpetrators. And women are by far more likely to be the victims of murder as a result of domestic violence. Dr. Michael Johnston, a professor emeritus from Penn State University was puzzled by these stats. He did extensive examination of different kinds of data to make sense the different findings.
